- Q. What percentage of the incidents you have researched involved law enforcement rather than a civilian?
- A. I've never broken it down. Probably the majority would be law enforcement. I don't see a whole lot of difference in this context for the simple reason that the citizen who chooses to be lawfully armed does so to defend themselves and their family from the exact same criminals the police are armed to defend them and you and me from.
- Q. I want to ask you a little bit more about that idea, but first, can you give me a sense of how common this type of situation you're describing would be for -- just for a civilian person, not a law enforcement officer on duty?
- A. For the private -- how often does a private citizen need more?
  - Q. Yes.
- A. We don't have real stats on that because there is no empirical database that is following all armed citizen shootings and collecting and analyzing them.

For that matter, we really don't have a true empirical database on all of the police shootings.

Some departments like the New York City Police

Department keep very careful records of how many incidents in a year, how many shots were fired by each officer and that sort of thing.

But some departments don't even report them to the FBI for statistics gathering. So it would be a minority, but a significant minority. And as I said in the declaration, it's not about the odds so much as it's about the stakes.

The saying in the business is, It's better to have the ammunition and not need it than to need the ammunition and not have it.

- Q. Over the course of your research, do you have any sense of how often a civilian fires more than 10 rounds?
- A. Again, without the empirical database, I can't say anything with confirmation. Yes. Do I have a feeling or a sense of it? Yeah. It would be in the minority. The great majority that's -- what we call DGUs, defensive gun usages, no shots are fired at all.

The criminal realizes they bit off more than they could chew. They have a victim who's not a victim anymore and about to shoot back, and they surrender or most often leave -- leave the scene. So the incidents with armed citizens where it actually comes to shooting are entirely on the fire end of the bell curve.

Q. How about education or training on how to conduct a statistical survey?

- A. No. Again I'm not a statistician, and I don't do surveys, which is why it's so difficult for me to give you answers to some of your questions.
- Q. In the course of your years of research, have you ever conducted any survey?
- A. I did a survey of Illinois troopers in 1976 or '77. I referenced their sidearms that I did for the bargaining organization, the Troopers Lodge. I must, at some point, have done some survey with a magazine article where readers write in about this, that or the other, but nothing I would consider formally statistics nor would present statistics.
  - Q. Do you have any medical education?
- A. EMT, emergency medical technician, but that has long since lapsed.
- Q. What kind of training did you receive for that?
- A. Basically resuscitation, use of administrating -- administering oxygen, what they call today stop the bleed, putting traction on broken limbs that, sort of thing.

We were shown how to perform a tracheostomy, if we had to, but told we hadn't been trained to do it,
